Mixed Messages: Memoirs of a Black Special Agent When Upbringing and Life Clash is the memoir of Maurice Williamson, who has been involved in federal law enforcement for 15 years and the Drug Enforcement Administration for over eight years. Passed up time and again for promotion, in favor of white colleagues with less impressive performance records, Maurice filed a complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Monitoring Committee. After consideration, the EEO dismissed his complaint, and the DEA fired him. Desperate for income, he became the very type of criminal he once helped lock up - and was arrested and interrogated by his former colleagues. "When I was guilty I could not be charged. I recalled when I was innocent but found guilty." A deeply personal look into the inner workings of the DEA, its flaws and foibles, as well as the author's own struggle to be a good father and provide for his children despite his deteriorating relationship with his wife. An absolutely compelling read from cover to cover. P.S. I used another name
